Dear members and friends of UNA-GP,

There is nothing like being in another country and culture than your own to give you perspective, and in some cases inspiration! I had the opportunity to be here in Colombia last week on election day and it has shown me a number of ways that democracies can be different: in both good ways and bad. One of the aspects of Colombia’s system that I am frankly envious of is the very reduced timespan of the elections. The Congressional and Senate elections were Sunday March 9th and only on the 10th were the presidential candidates allowed to register and kick off their campaigns for the voting on May 25th. Certainly there has been pre-campaign maneuvering, but nothing like the campaigning and expense of advertising that we endure in the US. Another interesting feature is the diversity of political parties, 9 parties running Congressional and Senate candidates, and at least 5 serious candidates for President. The voting was on a Sunday, so a day off for most people. The military are not allowed to vote and local political officials are not allowed to be involved in campaigning. There is a strict no-alcohol policy from the night before election to 6pm the day after, applying to all stores, bars, and restaurants. The most intriguing thing to me was the discovery of the “voto en blanco” or blank vote to indicate “none of the above”. In the Colombian constitution there is a provision that if 50% plus one of the votes are blank ballots, then the election must be held again with a completely different slate of candidates! Despite a lot of campaigning for the voto en blanco this time, only 7% of the congressional votes were blank, however it did go into effect for the Andean parliament (widely considered a useless bureaucracy) and a second election will be held for that. On the down side of the Colombian process, over 200 of the 1000 candidates had received threats during the campaign and required government security. One presidential candidate, recently returned from 17 years in political exile, was actually attacked while her car was traveling to an event, though she was not injured. And, even though the election came the day after national celebrations of International Women’s Day, there are provinces that still have no women in their congressional delegation. Colombia also has a much more positive attitude to UN observers for elections, welcoming their presence and facilitating their observation, compared to the US resistance to any international observation. This newsletter, as usual, is packed with announcements and reports on events. We will have a lively spring and look forward to our annual membership meeting in June and our increasingly traditional Global Garden Party in July, ways for our members to gather and build our working community. I look forward to being back in Philadelphia in early April can catching up with all our efforts!

Sincerely,

Mary Day

A few words from the Executive Director

From Christiaan's Desk

My desk being my laptop and my laptop being in Auckland, New Zealand, I write now with experiencing the extent of that global connection stuff. Philadelphia is so far away, it becomes part of the global scene with only the broad strokes of social life filtering through. I assume that such works both ways.

Being in Auckland, sports news is about rugby, and sometime cup sailing, and rugby, and reports about the English soccer league (after all, the UK Commonwealth still carries cultural and social weight), and rugby; here, rugby seems to provide many a Maori with career options, high visibility and a way to undo years of structural social violence.

We like New Zealand, at least what we witnessed on this second trip. Folks from many parts of the world have made NZ home; the food scene is as varied as in Philadelphia; education is very much a public thing, with all schools having the same level of funding, and no politician more interested in building prisons than building schools. I did not see any metal detector when entering the court of justice (happened to pass by), nor the city hall. On the other hand, New Zealanders have embraced the connected camera. Stores, stations, sidewalks, parks, taxis, everywhere there are these small cameras recording constantly. And Kiwis, as they call themselves, engage in the usual protests, cameras or not. Yesterday I witnessed a small demonstration marking the third anniversary of Fukushima, which made me wonder about Philadelphia.

The last weeks have been full of action. We got intern Aboubacar Doukoure, a high school student from SanKofa Freedom Charter with us, and he will work on the links between human rights and neo-colonialism, his subject of interest. We also interviewed coop students and two will help us out with planning several events, including the P3 Tournament, on which James Parsons is working hard. We are also getting all in gear for the Philadelphia Global Water Initiative conference on April 10 and I hope that many of our members will attend this important event, even if only for one or two of the special sessions. My friends Tammy Murphy and Anastasia Shown, both busy, both pregnant, joined me helping the Parkway High School for Peace and Social Justice where there was a dramatic lack of teachers for a while. Marietta Tanner and I are working on getting a great event together for UN Day 2014, and in doing so, we also presented at the I-Café about the link between Mandela's freedom and Philadelphia's Leon Sullivan. Planning the Red Cross Red Crescent Day on May 8 is shaping up, but we still need to secure the venue. Board members Carla Campbell and Ed Gracely are working with me on that event.

Of course I can go on and on, you know me, but I want to close with a picture I took early in the morning of Martin Luther King Day, near the zoo, when I went to UCity to pick up Ariane and Jesse. I stopped the car to take this picture of Philadelphia, silhouetted against the sunrise. It means that as a volunteer, you will witness many beautiful moments. Oh, don't forget to call your representative and demand that (s) he votes for full funding of the UN Peacekeeping Operations. Just do it.

Transforming the United Nations System: Designs for a Workable World

Arame and Julie “manning” the reception table at our Feb 23 event

On February 23, at the Fairmount Waterworks Interpretative Center for a full house we had Dr Schwartzberg leading a discussion on Reform of the United Nations; where he emphasized the need for a weighted voting system, a regional clustering of the countries' representations and improvement to the law making capacity of the General Assembly. I want to react in more detail to his suggestions in a blog or later newsletter, but for now want to thank the volunteers and our board members for making this event a good one. It inspired me to try re-starting the speaker series of a few years back. Stay tuned about that.

Cheers from New Zealand, where a cyclone is hitting the North Island and I am sending this before we may have a power failure on our hands.

Sullivan Principles

By Jesse Ferrante

On the 28th of February, at McAllister Hall, UNAGP and members of Drexel University gathered to celebrate the teachings and effects of the Sullivan Principles on the world. Leon Sullivan developed the Sullivan Principles as a part of an apartheid protest in 1977. The goal of the Principles was to have large companies like General Motors, of which Sullivan was a member of the board, refuse to employ citizens of South Africa as long as apartheid was taking place. The hope was that, with enough companies, the economic strain would force an end to apartheid. In an attempt to honor Sullivan in an appropriate way, some area leaders and activists proposed renaming the Philadelphia International Airport after Sullivan.

Our Alternative Model United Nations Conference

March 1

On the impact and uses of social media when promoting social justice through the rule of law.
By Christiaan Morssink

Delegates from Boys Latin High, one of 5 participating high schools

Organized by Daniel Bu, Minsoo Kim and Stephanie McAndrew, with input from board member Prachi Potdar (Charlotte Benham, who was instrumental in the early start of the conference, could not attend and we wish her speedy recovery), our second MUN on the Rule of Law was held at Houston Hall, University of Pennsylvania. It was attended by students from five high schools, although only two had gotten proper training beforehand to handle the rather esoteric concepts of justice, rule of law and social movement. We had more students than we expected and the room was packed.

Jessica Hilburn Holmes, CEO of the Pennsylvania Bar Foundation, was our keynote speaker and she delivered a strong personalized address about living and working in and on the rule of law and the quest for justice on a global scale. Her talk set the stage for a discussion in the plenary session, under very formal and strict rules, headed by Daniel Bu. It took a while to let the roles of “delegates” sink in. Also, the formula for the right to speak, in parliament often handled by the speaker’s office, was reduced to showing placards when called. It wasn’t the best of formats to allow a debate by all for all. Yet the students showed goodwill and eagerness. I was allowed to say a few words of welcome on behalf of the UNA-GP and discussed briefly the times of organizing and social protests, when I was the age of the current delegates. After lunch, the breakout sessions (three) provided the opportunity for all to get into more direct discussions and work on ideas to improve the usage of social media. It was by far the best period for dialogue and networking.

During the second plenary session, where we intended to integrate the discussions and prepare a formal resolution, things became a bit hectic and the attention span of many of the delegates reached its end point. Stephanie had set up a live tweet system, with the intent to solicit remarks, suggestions and constructive input. It worked well for a few minutes, and the novel idea has great possibilities, but it didn’t take long for the tweet discussions becoming a exercise in testosterone-driven dialogue. We had to shut the tweet format, to keep the attention to the proceedings. The session became filled with Daniel’s pleas of “Decorum Delegates” and “order, order”. All in good fun, don’t get me wrong, but we had clearly reached the limits of tolerance among many in the conference. We closed the conference with a draft of a resolution that called on all governments and all NGOs to promote and invoke the use of social media in all discussions that promote the Rule of Law and the quest for Social Justice. We closed at 4PM and our team, which also included Jesse and Arame, packed up our stuff and we went home, tired, and with a good feeling of accomplishment. Please find more pictures on our Facebook page and our website.
